Do you need more clients?

Most therapists have never taken a course in marketing. Further, they have not come to grips with the fact that they are running a business. They may have a handful of clients but they don't have a sound strategy for attracting new ones.

The traditional methods of passing out business cards and brochures and developing relationships with doctors in the hope that the doctors will refer clients to them are not very effective. They may give talks on mental health before women's groups, but this, too, has not led to having more clients.

Your practice isn't going to build itself. You have spent years developing your skill at helping people. It's time to let the world know about you.

There's a reason why successful companies pour huge amounts of time and money into marketing themselves. Marketing is the lifeblood of business. Without it, there is no growth.

If you have decided that working for a group or agency is not for you, then you will have to use the best available resources to attract new clients.

What is a new client worth? Potentially thousands of dollars, not to mention referrals.

Using the latest technology and on-line marketing tools, you can reach millions of potential clients.
